It is ruled that as the City Council duly acted, the commission has no power, under existing circumstances, to supervise or annul the action of the city authorities, who are by the Constitution vested with legislative discretion as to the services performed by such companies under the franchise to use the streets of the city. The Council's action as to the Virginia Rail-Council's action as to the Virginia Rail-way and Power Company, which oper-ates entirely in the city, as far as this case is concerned, must stand, and it would be unjust, it is held, to force the Rappahannock line to accept and honor transfers held by passengers leaving the city, when the other railway need not honor them for incoming people.

Taking the opposite position, Judge Wingfield, in his dissenting opinion, holds that "where a railway company operates a line or system not confined to one political subdivision, it cannot, by a transfer of part of its line, escape from its legal obligations, but that to one pointed subdivision, it cannot by a transfer of part of its line, escape from its legal obligations, but that the vendee of a part of the line takes it, subject to all the legal obligations of its predecessor, and that the two companies must maintain the rates previously in force until they have obtained the governt of the semical process. tained the consent of the co to advance such rates and charges." He thinks, therefore, the commission should require the companies to restor the former rates before it can be heard on a petition for increase.

Judge Wingfield thinks that the ma jority of the commission is reversing its former decision of 1904, when it ruled that the transfers on this line must be given, but this is expressly disclaimed by the other two members in their opinion, in view of the amend-ment granted by the City Council.
